[Sound of shoveling]

Fryar: I missed it. I mean, where in the world would you find...are you going to find something that's going to look like what we're doing? And it's just...it's really the idea of the people coming together.

And one thing about this project, I said to Ella all the time, is the fact that I want to make sure she'll get credit. I want to make sure you get credit. Because I've done things all over the country, and this is my best... [indecipherable] like I'm doing now. I can't talk.

Heidi Adler: I think, when you've got a project like this that so many people participate in, that when they visit the sites, they, themselves, take the responsibility to pull up a weed that's coming up or pick up a piece of trash. So I think the community is going to be a large maintainer of this space because they're real proud of it and they want to show it off and they want it to stay in the, the excellent state that it's...that it's going to be in.
